munchies Ripped off, frustrated and angry, I decided it would be the best use of my energy to be as unwelcoming as possible. There were only four days left before my friend decided to get married and I was so unprepared. The day before she “would” announce her engagement, I invited her out for brunch, we had a few drinks and then went for a walk. We hit it off like I suspected we would and I even got the first kiss. This was all going well and I was really feeling confident, I had to ditch the ashtray I had stolen from the bar in the morning, it was the only thing that got me amped up enough to finally speak to her. “Hey, I’m stealing this,” I said and placed it in my mouth and walked off to the nearest trash can. When I had wiped the cigarette off of it and rubbed my tongue on my finger, I realized it wasn’t an ashtray. “Oh, so you’re a smoker?!” she said, giving me a severe scowl.

“Damn. I am. Just don’t tell my fiancée, ok?” “Fine, just don’t be a hypocrite,” she said and just left me there. I couldn’t believe it. Of all the people at my sister’s wedding, how could she do this?! I felt like no one was on my side and I didn’t even have my friends to come over, but I knew they wouldn’t either. At my worst moments, I just wanted someone to grab me and take me away from the situation. Maybe if I could have someone to drive me home, I would have, but there wasn’t anyone who could keep up with me
