Attitudes of medical trainees to women with gynecologic problems. To assess attitudes of medical trainees to women with gynecologic problems, a survey was conducted of the attitudes of medical school (third-year) and house officer (fourth-year) students. The questionnaire consisted of two parts. The first part, which was used for a cross-sectional study of all 159 students (46 house officers and 113 medical school students) surveyed, evaluated their feelings in a variety of situations involving women with gynecologic problems. The second part of the questionnaire, which was used for a longitudinal study of 26 medical students in their first year of training, evaluated their knowledge of contraception, methods of sterilization, and alternatives to sterilization. In the cross-sectional survey, a significantly lower percentage of medical school than house officer students
